Work with hackers: new ways to sell photos

Please be aware that there is no London Freelance Branch meeting in August.

Older readers may remember the “holidays” that used to be taken at this time of year. Remember now that if you receive holiday pay for regular shifts, it’s on the understanding that you actually take some sort of time off.

LFB meetings return for an autumn season starting on Monday 12 September, as usual on the second Monday of the month.

Our speaker at the September meeting will be Cassie Werber, co-organizer of Hacks Hackers London, part of an international grassroots organization “to create a network of journalists (‘hacks’) and technologists (‘hackers’) who rethink the future of news and info… to help people make sense of their world” for example hackers exploring technologies to filter and visualize information and journalists using technology to find and tell stories.

The LFB meeting on Monday, 10 October will feature John D. McHugh speaking about new ways of selling photos online.

John, a conflict photographer whose work includes Afghanistan, recently founded Verifeye Media. This is a Mobile Journalism (MoJo) photo agency. Its new tech for mobiles and web-enabled cameras tags images with metadata verifying where they were taken, who the creator is, specifying the licences under which they are seeking to sell a re-use of that image. Verifeye uses “eyewitnesses” and paid-for freelances, selling licences for uses of your images on to news outlets.

This issue went to press on 19 July
 Deadline for the September issue: 22 August.

The Grunwick dispute 40 years on

August this year marks the fortieth anniversary of the start of the two-year Grunwick dispute. Older readers may remember how Asian women working in the Grunwick Film Processing Laboratories in Willesden went on a long strike over a number of workplace issues including union recognition.

The strikers received widespread support from the trade union movement, with postal workers refusing to deliver film reels for processing by the company. There were 550 arrests on the picket line, many by the notorious police Special Patrol Group.
